At the end of the day, it's about your art

Art will last a lifetime technology will not.

Many professional photographers will not hand over that disc at a low price point. The public mistakenly believe it's because these photographers have a desire to "hold your images hostage" but that isn't the case in most instances. Most photographers are DEDICATED to the artistry of photography. What this means is that they are selling a full service experience and are dedicated artisans who either print those images for you themselves or entrust their favorite professional photography labs to do it for you. They are not selling a DIY experience. Full service photographers care about the entire process. They take time to ensure their images look as perfect as humanly possible, from the time of shooting (capturing that perfect moment!) to delivering a finished product (your image printed as a large 30x40 canvas or perhaps a custom album with beautiful matted prints for gifts!). What this means is that the overwhelming majority of professional photographers take every step of the process seriously. From the camera equipment and lens choice they shoot with at your session, to coming home and downloading your images and editing those images on a calibrated monitor (many photographers pay for special equipment and software to custom calibrate their monitors with their professional lab of choice, this can be a painstaking process for many photographers because not all professional labs print images the same).

If a photographer sells digital images this is where the process stops. Sure they created and edited images and turned them over to you, the consumer. So what happens now? The final product is no longer tightly managed. Chances are you don't have access to a professional lab. Chances are even greater that your monitor isn't calibrated so when you view the images your photographer sent you...you're already at a disadvantage. Triple whammy that if the lab you choose hasn't calibrated or changed chemicals in awhile... you can end up with prints that are completely awful. All that for a set of professional images not worth displaying.

This unfortunately is the difference between beautiful images custom created for you painstakingly by your professional photographer and lackluster images printed up by the local drugstore. The photography may be phenomenal but if your lab processing is off the image may as well be taken by an iPhone camera!

The full service photographer is an artisan. They want to retain the image to present you with the absolute best quality image possible. The image they create for you is part of their vision and this vision is only fully realized when you take delivery of your beautiful photographs.

USB storage is a very recent phenomena and knowing how technology evolves chances are that the USB storage key you received from your photographer will go the way of the floppy disc within ten years, give or take. Think hard now, when is the last time you've seen a computer with a working floppy drive? Can you guarantee you'll still have a working computer with a USB port in ten years?
